Stop discounting to everyone: reward people for what they actually do

How behavior-based targeting gets more from every reward dollar.

The problem with the blast

A storewide discount feels generous. In practice, much of it goes to people who would have bought anyway. You pay for their loyalty twice: once when they chose you, and again when you discounted a purchase they were already making.

Blasts also train customers to wait for the next deal. The more often you run them, the less full price feels normal.

Demographics aren't behavior

Most targeting tools sort people by who they are: age, zip code, interests guessed from browsing. Those are weak signals. Two people with the same age and zip code can shop completely differently.

What predicts a visit is what someone actually does. Do they already spend in your category? Are they in a top tier somewhere else? Do they have points about to expire? Is it their birthday month?

Signals that matter

On Perkalate, members connect the loyalty accounts they already have and choose what they share. That gives you permissioned, verified signals to build an audience from:

- Shops your category. People who already spend on what you sell.
- Top loyalty tier. Customers who behave like loyal customers somewhere else.
- Points expiring soon. A timely reason to visit you instead.
- Birthday this month. A natural moment for a treat.
- Visits often. People who visit businesses like yours regularly.
- Lives near your store. Customers who can actually walk in.

You see audience totals and results, never individual identities.

Same budget, sharper aim

Here's an illustration. Say you have a fixed reward budget. Spread across everyone, most of it lands on people who didn't need a reason to come in. Aimed at verified customers in your category who haven't visited you yet, the same budget goes to people whose behavior you're trying to change.

A good rule of thumb: start narrow. "Top-tier beauty customers near the store with a birthday this month" beats "everyone in the city." A smaller, sharper audience usually gets more of the budget redeemed by people who matter.

You stay in control of spend

With Perkalate, you only pay for the rewards you fund, and you set the budget. Every reward has a limit, such as one use per member and a clear end date, so there are no surprises.

The takeaway

Discounts aren't the problem. Aiming them at everyone is. Reward the behavior you want, from the people most likely to show it, and every dollar works harder.
