Viewed, claimed, redeemed: how to measure a reward

Three numbers that tell you whether a reward is working, and what to change when it isn't.

Why most brands can't tell

Ask a business owner whether last month's promotion worked and you'll often hear, "I think so." Sales went up, but so did foot traffic for the season. Codes were used, but nobody knows who would have come in anyway.

You don't need a data team to answer this. You need to follow one reward through three steps.

The three numbers

Number	What it tells you	If it's low
Viewed	Did the right people see it?	Check the audience and placement
Claimed	Did they want it?	Make the reward more compelling or clearer
Redeemed	Did it bring them in?	Make it easier to use: longer window, more valid times

Reading the funnel

High views, low claims. People saw it and passed. The reward is too small, too vague, or not right for this audience. Rewrite it as one line someone would act on, like "Free add-on with your first visit," and try a stronger value.

High claims, low redemptions. People wanted it but didn't come in. Usually the reward is hard to use: a short window, limited days, or confusion at the counter. Extend the window and walk your counter team through what the Pass looks like.

Low views. The audience may be too narrow, or the reward isn't where people look. On Perkalate, rewards sit in members' wallets next to programs like Amex, Delta and Marriott, so placement is handled. Widen the audience one signal at a time.

Measure what you paid for

With Perkalate, you only pay for the rewards you fund, and every redemption shows up in your dashboard by store and channel. That makes the math simple: what you spent on redeemed rewards, against the visits and sales those redemptions represent.

A two-week rhythm

1. Day 1: Launch one reward to one audience.
2. Day 7: Check views and claims. Adjust the reward copy if claims are low.
3. Day 14: Check redemptions. Keep what works, fix what doesn't, and add a second reward for a second goal.

The takeaway

A reward isn't working because sales went up. It's working when the right people saw it, wanted it and used it. Track those three numbers and you'll know exactly what to change.
